MANAGEMENT POLICY

During May, the equity markets extended their upward momentum, showing remarkable resilience in the face of a geopolitical context that remained uncertain in the Middle East. This movement was mainly fueled by persistent enthusiasm for the semi-conductor sector and hopes of a ceasefire extension in the region.
In the United States, this tech-driven euphoria enabled indices to reach new all-time highs: the Nasdaq recorded a spectacular rise of more than 8%, bringing its performance since the beginning of the year to +16%, while the S&P 500 advanced by more than 5%. Momentum was similarly confirmed in Japan, where the Nikkei index rose by nearly 10 % over the month. In Europe, however, May saw multi-speed performance, with a clear divergence between financial markets. Southern markets outperformed strongly, with the Italian (FTSE MIB) and Spanish (IBEX 35) indices both up over 3%, driven by their banking sectors and more robust domestic demand. Germany (DAX) also performed strongly, rising by 2.9 %. Conversely, Paris and London lagged; the CAC 40, penalized by the underperformance of consumption, was limited to a gain of 0.8 %, while the FTSE 100 was held back by the weakness of oil stocks.
On the macroeconomic front, persistent inflation led markets to temper expectations of imminent central bank easing, while oil prices saw a notable détente over the period.
This month, the strategy delivered a positive performance, driven by the technology and finance sectors. Conversely, energy, real estate and consumer staples contributed negatively to performance. This upward momentum can be explained by a notable increase in risk appetite, particularly visible in AI-related stocks, which posted remarkable performances over the period.
