MANAGEMENT POLICY

March marked a turning point for the US economy as consumer confidence deteriorated following the Trump administration's pricing decisions. Higher tariffs on Japanese and Korean automobiles, Chinese and Mexican and Canadian goods raised inflation expectations and reduced growth expectations over the next two years. The Federal Reserve itself reduced its outlook for real GDP growth from 2.1% to 1.7% in 2025 and 1.8% in 2026. The outlook for manufacturing continues to deteriorate with the ISM manufacturing index slightly below expectations. Consumer confidence is falling and spending is rising modestly while the savings rate is rising again.

Against an uncertain backdrop, the Fed opted to delay and kept interest rates unchanged at the whim of President Trump. However, given the volatility in the bond market, it slowed the pace of its balance sheet reduction. The publication of February's PCE core inflation, the Fed's favourite measure, at the end of the month, came out above expectations at 2.8% year on year, which should mean it will not cut rates again in April.

The strategy posted a negative performance over the month, marked by high volatility due to Trump's trade policy announcements, including the increase in tariffs on products from the main trading partners of the United States. From a sector perspective, defensive sectors such as healthcare, energy and consumer staples outperformed. In contrast, the technology sector continued its downward trend, with semi conductor and AI stocks continuing to suffer since the beginning of the year. The consumer discretionary sector suffered from the impact of deteriorating consumer confidence and has continued to underperform for the past two months. Among the main changes, we reduced exposure to the consumer discretionary sector in favour of utilities. We also reduced exposure to the energy and real estate sectors and increased exposure to communication services.
